Did You Know?

The mercury that Compact Florescent Lights contain will not cause health or environmental issues while inside the tubes. It can only become a problem when you discard the tubes. Mercury in the environment is known to have adverse effects on fish, humans and other animals. To keep mercury from becoming a concern, always dispose of CFLs properly. CFLs should never be sent to an incinerator, which would disperse the mercury into the atmosphere. Neither should they be disposed of in regular solid waste, where they would break.

Save spent CFLs and have your janitorial company correctly dispose of your burnt out lamps. Due to their long life, you will have far fewer used CFLs than you are accustomed to with incandescent bulbs.
